CONSIDERATION OF REPORTS, COMMENTS AND INFORMATION SUBMITTED BY STATES PARTIES UNDER ARTICLE 9 OF THE CONVENTION (agenda item 5) (continued)

Draft conclusions of the Committee concerning the tenth to thirteenth periodic reports of Venezuela (CERD/C/49/Misc.16, distributed in the meeting in English only)

Paragraph 13

1. Mrs. ZOU said she did not really understand why the Committee should mention the existence of separate prison facilities for persons of the indigenous population unless racial discrimination was involved.

2. Mr. VALENCIA RODRIGUEZ suggested that the proposed text should be left unamended in view of his intended revision of paragraph 19, which dealt with the same point.

Paragraph 14

3. Mr. VALENCIA RODRIGUEZ proposed deleting the paragraph as it reflected an idea already expressed in the second part of paragraph 2.

Paragraph 19

4. Mr. VALENCIA RODRIGUEZ proposed that the Committee should recommend that the State party should provide additional information on the reasons for maintaining separate prison facilities for members of the indigenous population and that the beginning of the paragraph should be redrafted accordingly.

5. The draft conclusions of the Committee concerning the tenth to thirteenth periodic reports of Venezuela, as a whole, were adopted, as orally amended.

Draft conclusions of the Committee concerning the tenth periodic report of Zaire (CERD/C/49/Misc.18, distributed in the meeting in English only)

Paragraph 16

6. Mr. CHIGOVERA wondered whether the provisions of the law referred to in this paragraph actually amounted to racial discrimination or whether they simply imposed a number of additional conditions which were applicable to all Zairians.

7. Mr. van BOVEN said that even if the law was not intended to be discriminatory, it undeniably was in practice, particularly as far as the Banyarwanda were concerned.

8. Mr. GARVALOV recalled that he had mentioned the non-discriminatory character of the Zairian nationality law when the State party's report was being considered. There was therefore no reason to amend the paragraph.
Paragraph 22

9. The CHAIRMAN suggested that the word order in the third line of the text might be amended to read “to prevent raids by former FAR members into Rwanda ...”.

Paragraph 27

10. Mr. SHERIFIS said he understood that the High Commissioner for Human Rights was to meet the Zairian Minister of Justice the following day for the signing of the agreement referred to in the text. It would therefore be preferable to state that the Committee welcomed the signing of the agreement and appealed for its prompt implementation.

11. Mr. WOLFRUM said that, according to his own information, the situation was quite different and the agreement might not be finalized for some time.

12. Mr. van BOVEN said that, despite the repeated promises of the Zairian authorities, including at the last session of the Commission on Human Rights, the signing of the agreement had been pending for 18 months. It would therefore be premature for the Committee to welcome it.

13. Mr. DIACONU suggested deleting the words “and the implementation” in the second line of the initial text, as they referred to the implementation of the agreement.

14. The CHAIRMAN said that the initial text would be retained, with Mr. Diaconu’s amendment, on the understanding that, if the situation changed the following day, Mr. Sherifis’ proposal would be considered adopted.

Paragraph 28

15. Mr. GARVALOV said that, while he could accept the proposed text, he would have preferred the State party’s periodic report and the Committee’s conclusions to be disseminated in all the languages of Zaire, in accordance with the wording adopted for the Committee’s conclusions concerning the reports of other countries where several languages were used.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY AT ITS FIFTY-FIRST SESSION UNDER ARTICLE 9, PARAGRAPH 2, OF THE CONVENTION (agenda item 9)

16. The CHAIRMAN suggested that, at the beginning of the Committee’s report to the General Assembly, mention should be made of the problems caused by the fact that documents were not available in all working languages because of the reduced capacity of the translation services.

17. It was so decided.
PREVENTION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION, INCLUDING EARLY WARNING AND URGENT PROCEDURES (agenda item 4) (continued)

Situation in Liberia

18. Mr. WOLFRUM (Rapporteur for Liberia) said that further useful information on Liberia could certainly be provided by Mr. Ahmadu who was very familiar with the situation, particularly since forces from his country, Nigeria, were involved in the peace-keeping operations in Liberia. It should be understood from the outset that the situation in Liberia clearly fell within the purview of the Committee, for although the conflict there was internal, the factions were split along ethnic lines.

19. At the end of 1989, violent clashes had taken place between the Liberian army and the rebel forces of the National Patriotic Front of Liberia (NPFL) led by Charles Taylor, who had then proclaimed himself President of an interim administration. However, dissension within Charles Taylor’s faction had degenerated into ethnic conflicts which had claimed the lives of many civilians. In August 1990, a conference of the main parties involved convened by the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) in the Gambian capital Banjul, had elected Amos Sawyer President of an interim government of national unity. However, in September, the peace settlement proposed by the new President had been rejected by Charles Taylor. In February 1991, at a meeting in Lomé (Togo), the factions had concluded another agreement for the appointment of a new interim government and presidential and legislative elections had been called for October 1991. Armed clashes had nevertheless followed. A new agreement for disarming the factions concluded between Amos Sawyer and Charles Taylor in Yamoussoukro in September 1991 had been reaffirmed at a summit meeting in Geneva in April 1992. However, in December 1992, Charles Taylor had insisted that the disarming procedure should be monitored by the United Nations.

20. Early in April 1993, the ECOWAS Monitoring Group (ECOMOG) announced that it had gained control of the port of Buchanan. In the same month, the United Nations Security Council had condemned the attacks on ECOMOG and implied that the United Nations was prepared to undertake further measures against any faction that failed to comply with the Yamoussoukro Agreement. In July 1993, a further peace agreement had been signed by the parties in Cotonou (Benin) and further negotiations between the parties to the conflict had been held in February 1994 and again in August 1994. In September 1994, the factions had signed another peace agreement providing for the immediate cessation of hostilities and the establishment of a reconstituted five-member Council of State representing the various factions. Presidential and legislative elections had been scheduled for October 1995 and the new organs of government were to be installed in January 1996. However, the provisions of the agreement had promptly been criticized. Although in January 1995 the ECOWAS Heads of State had proposed expanding the membership of the Council of State, the negotiations had failed because of Charles Taylor’s demand that he be made Chairman of the Council.

21. The most recent agreement, signed on 19 August 1995 in Abuja (Nigeria), had been put into effect in so far as a new Council of State had been installed pending the elections, and a cease-fire had been declared. The elections scheduled for August 1996 had not taken place and there had been some cease-fire violations, but all the parties had seemed resolved to abide by the new time-table recently drawn up by the heads of State and government who were members of the ECOWAS Committee of Nine on Liberia. The time-table provided for the extension of the Abuja Agreement until 15 June 1997; monitoring of the cease-fire and disengagement of the warring factions by ECOMOG and the United Nations Observer Mission in Liberia (UNOMIL), as well as by the interim government and completion of the operation by 31 January 1997; and deployment of ECOMOG forces in safe havens during that same period. The Committee of Nine had also decided to sanction recalcitrant factions. The communiqué setting out those decisions had been signed by, among others, Charles Taylor and by the leader of the NFPL, who was a member of the Council of State, as well as by the Minister of Defence.

22. As that brief account showed, a return to normality was under way and, despite the extreme brutality of the civil war, it was possible to see a viable future. The determination of the African States, in particular, was an encouraging sign. The Committee itself might have been able to influence events if it had acted soon enough. But, for the time being, all it could do was take note of the positive developments, offer its assistance and decide to keep the situation in Liberia under review. As the disarmament process was to be completed by 31 January 1997, it would be able, at its next session, to decide whether the situation still fell within the scope of agenda item 4.

23. Mr. AHMADU began by noting that efforts to resolve the Liberian situation had been marked by a series of failures: the African peace-keeping force had had no peace to keep and had been unable to intervene; the many successive agreements had not been observed; and power had passed from hand to hand without bringing peace. The United Nations itself had not intervened until after the failure of the eighteenth agreement.

24. The latest effort, the Abuja agreements, seemed to be working, as the main factions had accepted the measures laid down for their disarmament and disengagement and for the elections, and the authorities were determined to bring the warlords to heel. The process would be gradual and should be successful, as a number of African countries involved had threatened to withdraw their troops if it failed.

25. In his view, the Committee should appeal to the international community to provide the necessary logistical support to the ECOWAS countries and ECOMOG forces and urge the United Nations to extend the mandate of UNOMIL, as it had undertaken to do if the leaders of the warring factions complied.

26. Mr. de GOUTTES said that the Committee might also refer to the report of the Special Rapporteur on the question of extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions (E/CN.4/1996/4) which mentioned executions of civilians, including women and children, many of them ethnically motivated, and the impunity enjoyed by those responsible because of the lack of any judicial system.

27. Mr. GARVALOV asked whether the Committee should not decide to keep the situation in Liberia on the agenda under item 4, until such time as it could assess the effectiveness of the latest solutions contemplated, and resume consideration of the situation at that time, even if it had to request Liberia urgently for information.

28. Mr. FERRERO COSTA suggested that the Committee should go beyond what Mr. Wolfrum had proposed by stressing that the problem was the result of ethnic conflicts and that the situation was grave and expressing the hope that the process currently under way would continue in the right direction.

29. The CHAIRMAN suggested that a drafting group comprising Mr. Wolfrum, Mr. Ahmadi and Mr. Ferrero Costa should draft a text on Liberia for consideration at the following meeting.

30. It was so decided.

31. Mr. van BOVEN recalled that the current wording of paragraph 3 was not acceptable to all members and submitted to the Committee a different wording proposed by Mr. Shahi. The new version expressed the Committee’s fears, for all the reasons listed in the second part of the existing paragraph, and went on to express the fervent hope that, when held the following month, the elections would be free, fair and democratic. He himself would prefer to keep the existing amended text as proposed earlier by Mr. Sherifis, which stressed the Committee's preoccupations rather than its optimism.

32. Mr. WOLFRUM said that, while well-intentioned, Mr. Shahi’s initiative in its current form might nevertheless appear somewhat cynical, in that it was unlikely that anybody having expressed such fears could sincerely hope for free elections.

33. Mr. YUTZIS, adding to what had been said by Mr. Wolfrum, said that, having described the factors impeding the holding of free elections, the Committee should then call for those factors to be eliminated, rather than expressing an abstract hope which was incompatible with the situation described. He was prepared to vote for the text proposed by Mr. van Boven.

34. Mr. FERRERO COSTA proposed that the Committee should vote on Mr. van Boven’s text as modified earlier by Mr. Sherifis.

35. After an exchange of views in which Mr. FERRERO COSTA, Mr. CHIGOVERA, Mr. SHAHI and Mr. GARVALOV took part on whether the text proposed by Mr. Shahi was an amendment or an entirely new text, the CHAIRMAN suspended consideration of the decision on Bosnia and Herzegovina to give the floor to the High Commissioner for Human Rights.

ORGANIZATIONAL AND OTHER MATTERS (agenda item 3) (continued)

Exchange of views between the High Commissioner for Human Rights and the Committee

36. Mr. van BOVEN said that he had read with great interest the document submitted to the General Assembly on the restructuring of the Centre, entitled: Programme budget for the 1996-1997 biennium - Restructuring of the Centre for Human Rights - Report of the Secretary-General (A/C.5/50/71), which had been circulated to Committee members. He wished to raise three questions concerning the restructuring, purely from the perspective of the Committee.

37. Firstly, it was stated that the restructured Centre would comprise three branches (A/C.5/50/71, paras. 15-18), namely, the Research and Right to Development Branch, the Support Services Branch and the Activities and Programmes Branch. The work of human rights treaty bodies, the Commission on Human Rights and the Sub-Commission would be handled by the Support Services Branch, which seemed perfectly logical. Would that Branch provide technical services? They were highly important for the Committee. For example, when considering the report of a State party, the Committee needed basic services such as analyses of the existing documentation on the State party in question, preparation of its work, etc. The Committee had in fact already received such assistance from the secretariat, which had prepared preliminary draft conclusions concerning each of the States whose reports were considered by the Committee. That was a demanding task which required knowledge of the Convention and of the Committee’s practices, as well as certain specialized knowledge which could not be acquired without some continuity in the staff employed by the Centre. In recent years, there had been many regrettable changes in the composition of the Centre’s staff.

38. Secondly, a number of questions concerning racism and racial discrimination considered, for example, in the context of the Third Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination, would fall within the purview of the Research and Right to Development Branch. He would like to see some coordination, with the Support Services Branch participating in research in so far as it was responsible for the Committee’s work. That point had been raised in connection with the seminar to be held in September to evaluate the Committee’s activities.

39. Thirdly, he noted that assistance to special rapporteurs and representatives, experts and working groups mandated to deal with situations or types of alleged violations of human rights was to be the responsibility of the Activities and Programmes Branch (A/C.5/50/71, para. 17 (h)). That allocation of responsibility was surprising. In view of the advantages of cooperation between special rapporteurs and the Committee, and to provide for better circulation of information, it would seem more logical for the necessary services to be provided by the Support Services Branch, which was to serve the treaty bodies.

40. Mr. DIACONU informed the High Commissioner of his concern regarding the seminar to be held in September to evaluate the Committee’s activities in connection with the various articles of the Convention. Two members of the Committee were to submit a report on two articles of the Convention and he had no doubt that they would present the Committee’s activities as a whole in a proper perspective.

41. His concern arose from the fact that the seminar would, as such, draft a report and reach conclusions. That would have two consequences for the Committee. Firstly, it would have to consider the report and its conclusions at a meeting, which would reduce the time available for its proper task of considering the reports of States. Secondly, the seminar’s conclusions could raise difficulties for the Committee with regard to States parties if they concerned the Committee’s methods of work and its interpretation of the Convention. The very principle of the independence of experts was at stake. The High Commissioner could help the Committee in that respect, in that the secretariat could ensure that the seminar’s evaluation focused not on the Committee’s methods of work, but on the worldwide implementation of the Convention, on the situation with regard to racial discrimination throughout the world, on the Convention’s contribution to combating racial discrimination and on what might be done in future in that regard within the United Nations community.

42. Mr. de GOUTTES assured the High Commissioner that he had given the Committee a full account of the talks they had had on 6 August following the exchanges of views with the Committee.

43. He associated himself with the comments made by Mr. van Boven and Mr. Diaconu and also drew the High Commissioner’s attention to the effect of the United Nations financial difficulties on the Committee’s work, particularly with regard to working languages. With only two exceptions, the Committee had been compelled to adopt its conclusions on the reports of States parties on the basis of the only text available, namely the English text. That was an unsatisfactory situation. A note expressing the Committee’s concern in that regard would be included in its report to the General Assembly.

44. With regard to the situation in Burundi, he asked the High Commissioner to provide the Committee with the latest available information on cooperation between the United Nations and Burundi. The High Commissioner had made known his wish to see the number of human rights observers increased. Had he obtained satisfaction? Any other, more recent, information from the High Commissioner regarding the situation in Burundi would be welcome.

45. Mr. GARVALOV said that new ways must be found of strengthening cooperation between United Nations human rights bodies and the human rights treaty monitoring bodies. Meetings could be held, for example, between representatives of both to consider some of the priorities in the human rights field. While those priorities had not changed since the adoption of the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action in 1993, the relative importance accorded to each of them would appear to need adjustment. An example of such cooperation was the meeting held with representatives of CERD in 1995 in the office of the Chairman of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities.

46. Secondly, he would like to see closer cooperation between the treaty bodies and the special rapporteurs appointed by the Commission on Human Rights. Since the Commission’s appointment of a Special Rapporteur on contemporary forms of racism, the Committee had had only one opportunity to meet him for an exchange of views. The Committee, which comprised 18 members, had a vast amount of information which it could make available to the Special Rapporteur. Such cooperation would therefore be mutually beneficial. Thirdly, he called on the High Commissioner to continue to avail himself of the Committee’s combined specialized knowledge. Fourthly, he drew the High Commissioner's attention to the importance attached by the Committee to early warning and urgent procedures in identifying situations and problems involving racism and racial discrimination. He expressed the hope that the High Commissioner would continue to support the Committee in that regard.

47. With regard to the planned new structure of the Centre on Human Rights (A/C.5/50/71), he expressed surprise that one of the branches had been named the “Research and Right to Development Branch”. Why give special treatment to the right to development? Did it not simply fall within the category of economic rights?

48. Mr. SHERIFIS thanked the High Commissioner for the information he had provided on efforts to achieve wider dissemination and universal ratification of the Convention. However, ratification of the Convention by a State was not enough; most important was its implementation.

49. He hoped to be able to count on the High Commissioner's assistance in ensuring implementation of the decisions taken by the Committee. He regretted that the Committee had not been informed about the seminar planned for September. There was perhaps a coordination problem which the High Commissioner should look into in the context of the reorganization of the Centre for Human Rights.

50. He welcomed both the creation of the post of United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights and Mr. Ayala Lasso's appointment to it. In order to carry out his mandate, the High Commissioner would need in particular financial and technical resources. It was to be hoped that they would be made available to him. The Committee would do everything in its power to help him in his task.

51. Mr. AHMADU drew the High Commissioner's attention to the question of countries whose reports were long overdue. Many countries signed the Convention, submitted an initial report and then failed to submit any reports or send representatives, in spite of repeated reminders. The Committee had even been compelled to devise a method of considering the implementation of the Convention in a State party which had not submitted a report or sent a representative. That was quite unsatisfactory. How could those countries be assisted in complying with the obligations they had contracted in signing the Convention?

52. Even if some seminars and symposiums held by the Centre for Human Rights did not directly concern the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, the members of the Committee would like to be informed of them so that they could attend meetings held in their own regions, even at their own expense. Such activities afforded them an opportunity to gain fresh insights and increase international awareness of the Convention.

53. Mr. SHAHI recalled that, during the process of preparing for the World Conference on Human Rights, representatives of treaty bodies had agreed to emphasize prevention and urgent procedures. Unfortunately, the Conference had not accepted their suggestions. As the Committee had made specific proposals to the Secretary-General in that connection, particularly with regard to Rwanda and Burundi, he wondered whether the High Commissioner might prevail on the Security Council and other competent bodies to intervene rapidly in cases of gross violations of human rights, including genocide and ethnic cleansing operations.

54. He suggested that, as the Committee was sometimes obliged to consider the situation in a country without any representatives of the State party concerned being present, it might hold one of its two sessions in New York, where representatives of Member States were more numerous. As the original decision to hold one of the Committee's two sessions in Geneva had been taken for reasons of economy, it was debatable whether it was still valid, particularly given the considerable appreciation in the value of the Swiss franc since then.

55. Mr. AYALA LASSO (United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights) said he had decided to restructure the Centre because it clearly no longer met the expectations of Member States. According to reports by the United Nations Secretariat in New York, the Centre did not deal with any questions of substance but confined itself to servicing conferences and meetings. Moreover, its activities were completely uncoordinated, and there was no system of self-appraisal and no way of knowing whether, or to what extent, programmes were actually implemented. It had comprised five branches organized on an autonomous basis, each with its own secretariat and entirely cut off from the others. The first aim of the restructuring had therefore been to break down the walls between the various units and set up common procedures and machinery.

56. The new Research and Right to Development Branch would be responsible for collecting new data and analysing information already available, evaluating it and communicating it to other branches to facilitate their work. The Support Services Branch would still be responsible for analysis and research, but using the raw data provided by the Research and Right to Development Branch. As to whether it might not have been better to entrust technical cooperation, operational services and special procedures to three separate branches, he said that, after lengthy consideration, it had been decided, for reasons of efficiency, to have programmes and activities handled by a single branch. For the same reasons, the Activities and Programmes Branch would also be responsible for special procedures support.

57. There was currently unprecedented change taking place in the process of protection and promotion of human rights, and the Centre had to be equal to the task. The new structure to be introduced was not perfect and would certainly require adjustments. It would take time for new traditions to be instituted and well-oiled procedures to be developed.

58. At the current stage, it was difficult to answer all the questions asked, as there were numerous uncertainties which could only be dispelled within the restructuring process itself.

59. Within the new structure, cooperation between the various working groups, treaty bodies and special rapporteurs dealing with similar questions would be of the utmost importance. The secretariat must also be associated with the process. The Centre would not simply encourage contacts, but would make every effort to facilitate them. In that respect, the contribution of human rights treaty bodies must be accorded its true value. They offered an eormous potential which must be fully tapped.

60. Setting up an early warning system was not easy, as demonstrated by the case of Rwanda. A special rapporteur had drawn the attention of the Commission on Human Rights to the situation in that country three months before the crisis had broken out. However, no decision had been taken. The problem was not simply devising the necessary machinery, but also being able to put the necessary resources in place and use them.

61. Within his mandate, he would do everything in his power to ensure that preventive action became a reality. That had actually been his objective when he had decided to open a technical cooperation office in Bujumbura in June 1994 and when, some months later, he had proposed deploying a team of observers in Burundi. That latter proposal had actually been approved by the international community and, in particular, by the European Union, which had agreed to finance the deployment of 35 observers. Unfortunately, of the $3.5 million pledged, only 400,000 had been forthcoming, so that it had been possible to send only 5 observers into the field. In addition, recent developments in Burundi had complicated the operation. Sources of financing in the European Union were now wondering whether it was advisable to send more observers at a time when, for security reasons, United Nations agencies and humanitarian organizations were withdrawing their staff. The operation must continue however and, as soon as funding was available, he would arrange for the deployment of more observers.

62. Regarding overdue reports, he said that he had taken every opportunity to remind States parties of their obligations. For many of them, the problem was that they did not know how to compile a report. That was why more emphasis should be placed on technical cooperation in that respect. An agreement recently concluded with Cambodia, for example, contained a clause on the provision of technical assistance to help the Government prepare the reports which it had undertaken to submit. In addition, at a meeting on the question, experts from the Centre had explained to representatives of 10 Cambodian ministries how to prepare such reports. Two Cambodian officials had also recently been given appropriate training in Geneva. A seminar on the question was also soon to be held in Latin America.

63. It was quite legitimate for members of the Committee to be informed of activities organized by the Centre. He wished to assure them that, under the new structure, no effort would be spared to improve the circulation of information.

64. The seminar to evaluate the implementation of the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination was part of the programme of the Third Decade to Combat Racism and Racial Discrimination. In that connection, he drew the Committee’s attention to a letter dated 10 May 1996 from Mr. Gaham, Officer-in-Charge of the Legislation and Prevention of Discrimination Branch, to Mr. Banton informing him about the seminar and the reply received by the Centre on 14 May. Participants in the seminar would consider the obstacles to effective implementation of the Convention and would make observations and proposals which might prove extremely useful, not only to his own Office, but to all other competent United Nations bodies. The intention was not to criticize the Committee’s activities but to work together for the realization of the goals of the Third Decade.

65. Speeding up the Security Council’s response to gross violations of human rights was not a simple matter. Action by the Council depended on many factors, among which political considerations weighed very heavily. Moreover, his mandate did not give him direct contact with the Council. He reported to the United Nations Secretary-General, who was responsible for determining whether a human rights situation endangered international peace and security and should therefore be brought to the attention of the Security Council. Nevertheless, he himself consistently ensured that the Secretariat in New York was kept informed of developments in human rights situations so that the necessary measures could be taken.

66. Ending on a positive note, he informed the Committee that he had, that very day, signed an agreement with the Zairian Minister of Justice for the opening of an office in Kinshasa. The necessary funding was already available and it was hoped to have the new office in operation by October.

67. Mr. FERRERO COSTA welcomed the importance attached by the High Commissioner to the need to deal with problems as soon as they arose. Prevention and early warning of gross violations of human rights, particularly grave acts of racial discrimination, would become an increasingly important aspect of the Committee’s future work. Cooperation with the High Commissioner for Human Rights in setting up the necessary machinery would be crucial.

The meeting rose at 6 p.m.
