Initial report of Colombia (continued) (CED/C/COL/1; CED/C/COL/Q/1 and Add.1)

1. At the invitation of the Chair, the delegation of Colombia took places at the Committee table.
2. Mr. Hazan (Country Rapporteur), speaking in relation to search and identification efforts, said that the Committee had received reports that the implementation of the National Plan on the Search for Disappeared Persons had been slow and inefficient; he wondered whether difficulties in that regard were related to the fragmented approach taken to investigations. Had any assessment been carried out within the Attorney General's Office regarding compliance with the obligation to define a strategy to guide investigations to find disappeared persons and identify those responsible for their disappearance?
3. Recalling that the peace agreement with the Fuerzas Armadas Revolucionarias de Colombia-Ejército del Pueblo (FARC-EP) recognized victims' rights and provided for immediate search mechanisms in keeping with humanitarian law, he said that information should be provided on the outcomes of those mechanisms. The delegation should also comment on whether it envisaged the continuation, in the wake of the referendum result, of the widely supported policies in favour of victims, and it should clarify whether State agents had handed over information on disappeared persons in the framework of the immediate measures set forth in joint communiqué No. 62 of the Government of Colombia and the FARC-EP. Clarification was also needed regarding the inclusion of ante-mortem and genetic information in databases, as that would enable remains to be linked with missing persons, and regarding the number of families searching for a missing person that had provided such information.
4. The Committee would appreciate details of the steps taken to return to their families the bodies of victims who had not been reported missing, possibly in the belief that the persons had simply been displaced. It would also welcome a comment on the reported shortcomings of public awareness campaigns that focused on urban residents who had access to the media and which did not reach many of the victims' families, especially in rural areas.
5. The delegation should describe the resources available to the National Institute of Forensic Medicine and Science in addressing the challenges related to mass disappearances as well as the specific measures adopted to ensure that search processes and the restitution of remains were carried out respectfully and in a culturally sensitive way. The State party should also indicate whether the slow pace of identification and restitution efforts reflected a lack of political will or other factors, and it should describe any measures taken to protect and preserve graves and other places containing interred remains.
6. With regard to the prevention of enforced disappearance, the Committee had received information about cases in which persons deprived of their liberty had not been able to directly inform a person of their choice, as set out in the Code of Criminal Procedure. The State party should therefore indicate whether any mechanisms had been planned or implemented to guarantee such communications, and it should state what measures had been taken, if any, to address the concerns over the interpretation of article 303, paragraph 4, of the Code, referring to the right of a person deprived of liberty to appoint and meet with a trusted lawyer "as soon as possible". The Committee would also appreciate a more comprehensive response to the question regarding registers of persons deprived of their liberty other than those maintained by judicial, security and prison institutions. An update on the development, by the Disappeared Persons Investigative Commission, of a draft decree to establish a single register of arrested and detained persons, would also be welcome.

7. Given the reported irregularities in the registration of temporary detainees, including non-registration and incomplete records, the State party should indicate whether criminal or disciplinary proceedings had been brought against non-compliant officials and whether audits had been carried out to ensure compliance. What authority might be responsible for such oversight and enforcement functions? Lastly, he would appreciate further details concerning the number of disappearances having occurred at prison institutions, including figures for men and women, along with clarification of whether those disappearances were classed as cases of enforced disappearance, whether exhumations had taken place and whether investigations had been carried out to establish the involvement of prison officials.

8. Mr. Huhle (Country Rapporteur) said that he would like an explanation of the policies and measures that the State party intended to apply to avoid the situation whereby military criminal judges could decide to hear cases involving enforced disappearance, despite the cost, effort and potential hurt to victims that that entailed and the Committee's understanding that ordinary courts were the rightful jurisdiction.

9. He would be interested to know whether the legislation on victims' rights included, or would be extended in the future to include, the victims of enforced disappearance perpetrated outside of the armed conflict period. While the Committee welcomed the broad definition of victims under Colombian law, which included spouses, life partners, partners in same-sex couples, first-degree blood relatives and first-degree civil status relatives of the direct victim, it would like to know whether the State party planned to bring its definition into line with that set forth under article 24 of the Convention.

10. The State party was to be commended on the scope of the reparation measures described in its report, which were aligned with the Convention and which included compensation, rehabilitation and a historical memory component. The delegation should nevertheless state whether the representatives of victims had been involved in the design and implementation of those measures or whether the authorities carried sole responsibility. Had there been any independent assessment of the effectiveness of those measures? Information should also be provided on how many people had benefited, especially from psychosocial support measures. Regarding the rights to truth and rehabilitation, he asked whether the National Centre for Historical Memory, which had published a comprehensive report on enforced disappearances, would continue to receive funding and support in future and what might be its future relationship with the truth commission envisaged under the peace agreement.

11. Despite the sharp decline in human rights violations, the two years preceding the signing of the peace agreement had seen a rise in the persecution, murder and enforced disappearance of human rights defenders, including people expressly protected under article 24 (7) of the Convention on the right to form and participate freely in organizations and associations concerned with enforced disappearances. In that sense, the State party should provide statistics on the number of victims and describe the legislative and practical measures it had taken to guarantee those rights.

12. Lastly, he asked whether the State party could provide any information regarding the continued functioning of the country office of the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) in Colombia, which had undertaken tremendous efforts to support victims and defend their rights and whose mandate expired at the end of October 2016.

13. Mr. Hazan said that he would be interested to learn why 18,000 women had been classified in the statistics under "No information", and he asked whether there might be an element of confusion or overlap between crimes of enforced disappearance and those of human trafficking. Information should be provided on whether the State party planned to apply any gender mainstreaming strategies to investigations, sanctions and reparations in cases of disappearance of women and girls. Additionally, he would welcome confirmation of the State party's reply to paragraph 23 of the list of issues, which he interpreted as meaning that no additional legislative measures were envisaged (CED/C/COL/Q/1 and Add.1). Lastly, he asked whether procedures were in place for the annulment of adoptions that had taken place as a consequence of an enforced disappearance.

14. Ms. Janina said that with regard to article 16 of the Convention, she would like to know what mechanisms were at the State party's disposal to ensure that persons likely to be subjected to enforced disappearance could not be expelled, returned, surrendered or extradited, and whether Colombia had any legislative provision that enshrined the principle of non-refoulement. Pointing out that the victims of enforced disappearance included the female family members of disappeared persons, it would be useful to know whether the compensation and assistance measures provided by the State were gender-sensitive.

15. Mr. López Ortega, sharing Mr. Hazan's concern regarding registers in places of detention, said that he would like to know also what registers were maintained in psychiatric hospitals, youth detention centres and migrant holding centres. He would be grateful as well for information on how the families of persons serving custodial sentences were informed of changes in the place of detention. Finally, he asked whether the State party would recognize, either immediately or in the medium term, the competence of the Committee to receive individual communications, considering their importance for the oversight of the State and for the assertion of individual rights.

16. Mr. Yakushiji, thanking the delegation for its explanation of the measures taken to combat the intimidation of human rights defenders, said that, as several organizations had expressed deep concern at the continuing attacks, death threats and other forms of intimidation directed at human rights defenders, he would appreciate further information regarding the effectiveness of those measures, the steps taken and consultations held with a view to overcoming difficulties and enabling prompt, effective investigations that resulted in the punishment of offenders.

17. Mr. Decaux said that the Committee's request for disaggregated statistics was also relevant to the question of registers and that such information would be useful in establishing whether the specific problems of indigenous peoples were taken into account in the area of victims' rights.

The meeting was suspended at 3.30 p.m. and resumed at 4.05 p.m.

18. Ms. Londoño Soto (Colombia) said that the Government had no knowledge of cases of enforced disappearance in psychiatric facilities or in youth detention or rehabilitation centres, nor of any cases in which an adoption had had to be suspended owing to the enforced disappearance of the prospective parents.

19. Ms. Santa (Colombia) said that, as expressly provided by legislation, offences amounting to war crimes, crimes against humanity, enforced disappearance, genocide and torture, as well as other human rights violations, fell outside the scope of Colombian military criminal jurisdiction. In its judgments, the Constitutional Court had consistently emphasized the exceptional nature of military criminal jurisdiction, which was limited to offences involving breaches of military discipline. The Constitutional Court was not authorized to settle conflicts of jurisdiction between the ordinary and military criminal courts; rather, the Constitution assigned that function to the High Council of the Judiciary.

20. Article 303 of the Code of Criminal Procedure enumerated the rights of persons who were taken into custody and was based on the constitutional principle of habeas corpus. Article 28 of the Constitution stipulated that persons in Colombia could not be held in pretrial detention unless they were brought before a duly empowered judge within 36 hours following their arrest and unless the judicial authorities were notified of the judge's decision. The National Prisons Institute had designed and implemented an integrated information system for the prisons administration, which served as a single nationwide custody register. As at 25 July 2016, it had recorded a total of 136 prison facilities and 121,400 prisoners; of that number, some 80,000 prisoners were serving sentences and the remainder were awaiting trial. In order to ensure respect for the rights guaranteed under article 303, the Ministry of Defence pursued a comprehensive human rights and international humanitarian law policy that called for the provision of training to all law enforcement officials and military personnel concerning those rights.

21. When evaluating the legislation incorporating the provisions of the Convention into national law, the Constitutional Court had recognized that the definition of a victim of enforced disappearance under Colombian law was much broader than the one set out in the Convention. That was because Colombian law provided for the award of comprehensive reparation primarily on the basis of the ability of applicants to demonstrate that they had suffered harm as a result of the internal armed conflict and not necessarily on the basis of their status as a direct victim or family member of a direct victim.

22. Colombia did not yet envisage making the declarations provided for under articles 31 and 32 of the Convention. That decision had been based on its development of an extensive system for guaranteeing citizens' constitutional rights and on an informal assessment it had conducted of the system's effectiveness and of its domestic capacities. The delegation had nevertheless taken careful note of the Committee's recommendations in that regard.

23. According to the mixed extradition procedure outlined in the Code of Criminal Procedure, extradition requests were received by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and transmitted to the Attorney General's Office for the issuance of an arrest warrant against the person sought, following which the matter was referred to the Supreme Court. The Court appointed a defence lawyer to the person whose extradition was sought, set the deadlines for the receipt of evidence and determined whether or not the extradition request was appropriate. Upon issuance of a positive determination, the Government had 15 days within which to grant the extradition. The Ministries of Justice and Foreign Affairs were the contact points for requests for protection from extradited persons but subsequently transmitted those requests to the relevant judicial authorities.

24. Mr. Valdés (Colombia) said that the National Missing Persons Register contained reports of a total of 29,618 minors who had disappeared; of those, 2,250 concerned cases with characteristics of enforced disappearance. The Register also contained reports of the disappearance of 741 indigenous persons, 131 civil leaders, 99 political leaders, 70 trade union leaders and 43 human rights defenders. A three-stage search mechanism had been set up under the coordination of the Attorney General's Office; it consisted of documenting the disappearance, locating and identifying the human remains of victims and returning the remains to the victims' family. The Institute of Forensic Medicine participated in all three stages, in particular by providing the Attorney General's Office with information from its database and analysing and identifying human remains. The data it provided to the Attorney General's Office and the contents of the Register were subject to an inspection process.

25. Pursuant to the peace agreement signed with the FARC-EP, the Government had received information from the FARC-EP on the location of the remains of six disappeared persons, which had subsequently been returned to the victims' families. No information of that nature had been received pursuant to the agreement from any State institution.

26. The Institute of Forensic Medicine conducted interviews with victims' family members so as to identify those most suitable for biometrics collection and testing. The Disappeared Persons Genetic Profile Bank contained information on 21,821 family members and 3,641 human skeletal remains. To date, 1,050 persons had been identified through cross-checks of such genetic profiles.

27. The majority of unidentified bodies were in the process of being identified through DNA testing, which yielded the best results, although the success of that method was only as good as the data contained in the genetic profile databank. The full identification of bodies based on forensic information obtained from medical, odontological or anthropological analyses was relatively scarce, owing to the deterioration, fragmentation and mixing of human remains in the locations in which they were found. There had been only one case in which a body had been identified, but the contact information for the family that had provided samples several years previously could not be found. The Government organized public campaigns to obtain biological samples from the population when and as available funding permitted. Culturally respectful protocols for conducting autopsies and identifying remains had been developed in two indigenous communities in consultation with those communities.

28. One of the first actions taken by the Attorney General's Office following the promulgation of joint communiqué No. 62 in October 2015 was, in an effort to gain public trust, to present some of the initial results concerning bodies that had been identified and to return the human remains of 37 victims to their families in the city of Villavicencio. The Institute of Forensic Medicine had developed a strategy for cooperation with various cemeteries, and 3,011 corpses had been exhumed, of which, to date, 14 had been identified. When the Institute identified a body, it notified the Attorney General's Office, which activated the protocol for the dignified restitution of the remains, but it had no control over how long it took for the remains to be returned to the victims' families.

29. If mass graves were discovered in cemeteries, immediate action was taken to preserve the sites and notify the relevant civil and police authorities. When clandestine burial sites were discovered outside of cemeteries, immediate action was taken at the site. The Institute had devised and was implementing a system of secure repositories in various locations of the country in which the human remains found in the aforementioned sites were stored until such time as they could be analysed scientifically and in an effort to prevent a second disappearance.

30. In 2014, the Institute had adopted a strategic plan called Forensic Sciences for a Diverse and Peaceful Colombia, according to which gender, geographical, ethnic, cultural and political factors were taken into account in the Institute's forensic study of violence. The task of finding, identifying and returning the human remains of persons who had been subjected to disappearance posed major challenges, particularly in the form of the significant human, material and financial resources required. The Institute was in desperate need of more doctors, odontologists, radiologists, anthropologists and geneticists, as well as budgetary resources for the purchase of the technology and chemical reagents needed to conduct genetic testing on skeletal remains.

31. Mr. Valencia Muñoz (Colombia) said that the Colombian Government recognized the important role played by human rights defenders in the maintenance of democracy in Colombia. It consequently rejected any intimidation of or attack against them. Colombia had established a tripartite National Committee on Safeguards for Human Rights Defenders that brought together representatives of the State, civil society and the international community, and it had set up a national protection unit, which included a risk evaluation mechanism. In 2016, Colombia had allocated a budget of US$ 151 million to those efforts and had granted protection to 13,500 defenders.

32. Ms. Santa (Colombia) said that the work of the National Centre for Historical Memory in the area of disappearances had included the preparation of a series of four publications on disappearance in 2014 and a number of reports on obstacles to the access to justice faced by victims of disappearance and, in many cases, enforced disappearance. Those publications had provided important inputs for the peace agreement, particularly with regard to the chapter on victims.

33. Given the current circumstances, the Government could not guarantee that a commission on the clarification of truth, coexistence and non-repetition would indeed be established under the terms set out in the peace agreement. However, assuming that a similar truth commission was eventually established, it had been proposed that the latter would focus on shedding light on the truth in the many remaining unresolved cases of disappearance and that the National Centre for Historical Memory would focus on the construction of memorial sites and on collective processes of reconciliation.

34. Ms. Londoño Soto (Colombia) said that one complaint had been filed regarding enforced disappearance in Colombian prisons; the Attorney General had assigned one prosecutor and several investigators to the case and the Committee would be kept informed of the case's progress. The complaint had not been referred to the National Prisons Institute, to the Inter-American Court of Human Rights or to the Inter-American Commission of Human Rights.

35. The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) had established a permanent office in Colombia in 1996. That office, which oversaw 13 field offices around the country, had worked together with the national authorities to build a genuine human rights culture in Colombia; it also issued alerts and appeals concerning important issues, to which the Government was committed to responding promptly. The office's mandate had recently been extended for a further three years and it continued to receive considerable government funding to ensure that both the main office and the field offices were fully operational.

36. Mr. Huhle said that he would like to know what measures had been taken to increase the efficiency of the urgent search mechanism, which in some cases had taken months to respond to requests from victims' families. While welcoming the legislation that provided for the issuance of declarations of absence by reason of enforced disappearance, he wondered how often such declarations were issued in practice. It was important that that procedure should be accessible to families without their having to declare the death of the relative in question. The State party was to be commended for its admirable efforts in searching cemeteries for unidentified persons; however, it was unclear why the Attorney General's Office had been tasked with such a large-scale search operation, which might take resources away from its responsibilities regarding the investigation of cases of enforced disappearance.

37. Mr. Hazan said that he would appreciate information on the ages of the children who had been victims of enforced disappearance. He wondered whether some of them might have been victims of identity substitution and therefore might still be alive but were being raised by other families. An update should be provided on the child victims of the "false positives" scandal, specifically in Toluvié; on the investigations into the cases of 30 disappeared children who had been recruited in eastern Colombia by paramilitaries with the support of the military; and on the allegations of the recruitment of children and ongoing threats of further recruitment by paramilitaries in Buenaventura. While acknowledging the resource-related challenges facing the Government in carrying out searches and gathering evidence in rural areas, he nevertheless urged the authorities to do such work as promptly as possible, as delays could create additional difficulties in the long term.

38. Mr. López Ortega said that the State party should provide to the Committee, within 48 hours, information on the registers kept in psychiatric hospitals and in detention centres for minors, migrants and members of the military, respectively. While noting the steps taken by the Government to improve the centralization of records on persons deprived of their liberty, he said that the Committee had received information that there were many irregularities in the registers of persons deprived of their liberty, particularly in transitory detention centres. It would be useful to learn what strategies were being considered by the Government to ensure that records of detainees were kept in accordance with the Convention.

39. The Chair said that it was unclear whether the judiciary was sufficiently trained in order to apply the legislation providing for the issuance of declarations of absence by reason of enforced disappearance. It was part of the State party's obligations under the Convention to train its officials to apply the law, in particular the Convention. The Committee would appreciate statistical data on declarations of absence, specifically how many people had requested them and how many declarations had been issued since the legislation's entry into force. If the latter number was as low as had been reported to the Committee, he wondered whether the Government was considering adopting measures to raise awareness about that procedure.

40. Mr. Valdés (Colombia) said that the Government continued to face major challenges regarding the urgent search mechanism. Despite the training that the Attorney General's Office had begun providing some two years previously, there continued to be complaints about delays in initiating searches, in both urban and rural areas. The Attorney General's Office was firmly committed to raising awareness among its staff, and it had recently intensified initiatives in that direction so that complaints could be received at any time of day or night.

41. Although it was the Attorney General's Office that held the legal and constitutional mandate for initiating investigations into allegations of enforced disappearance, in 2012 the Institute of Forensic Medicine had launched the project on searching for unidentified persons in cemeteries. After gathering information on those sites in which a significant number of enforced disappearances had been registered and for which a large number of autopsy reports were available, the Institute had submitted that information to the Attorney General's Office in order to seek its support for the exhumation of the bodies. The Institute was therefore the main driver of the project.

42. Regarding the statistics on children who had disappeared, there were 527 victims between the ages of 0 and 4 years; 1,050 victims between the ages of 5 and 9; 11,988 between the ages of 10 and 14; and 16,053 between the ages of 15 and 17. He had no information on whether the child victims of enforced disappearance in Toluviejo might have been victims also of identity substitution. As to the 30 disappeared children in eastern Colombia, the Institute of Forensic Medicine had signed an agreement with the Colombian Family Welfare Institute in 2013 whereby the genetic data for all individuals who approached the Family Welfare Institute to file a complaint about a disappeared relative were compiled in a separate database, which would be used as an additional resource in the event that the data on adult disappeared persons did not result in a match. In response to the concern expressed about the children who had been recruited by paramilitaries in Buenaventura, the Institute of Forensic Medicine had increased its staff there to include two physicians, one psychologist and one social worker. The children were being monitored, with special attention given to those who had been sexually abused; information was recorded by the attending physicians at the two largest hospitals in Buenaventura and sent directly to the Attorney General's Office, which was the lead institution in the case. He noted the concerns expressed regarding the Institute's financial challenges and the related obstacles in gathering evidence and said that he wished to assure the Committee that a number of initiatives were already under way to resolve the remaining problems.

43. Ms. París (Colombia) said that the Disappeared Persons Investigative Commission and the Presidential Advisory Office for Human Rights had provided training to prosecutors, judges and police officers with a view to guaranteeing the effective application of the urgent search mechanism and implementation of the National Plan on the Search for Disappeared Persons and to raising their awareness of the inter-agency protocol on the dignified return of bodies of disappeared persons and all other laws and procedures intended to prevent, combat or address the crime of enforced disappearance. One of the main obstacles to the effective application of the mechanism was the high turnover of public officials within the entities concerned, many of whom were employed under short-term contracts.

44. It had been confirmed that a number of the reported cases of enforced disappearance were in fact cases of forced recruitment of children and adolescents into illegal armed groups. The Intersectoral Commission for the Prevention of Forced Recruitment, Sexual Abuse and Violence against Children and Adolescents by Illegal Armed Groups and Criminal Organizations was responsible for coordinating the efforts undertaken by 23 State entities to protect the rights of children and adolescents and to prevent their recruitment and abuse by armed groups, which included an early intervention programme run by the Colombian Agency for Reintegration. The Intersectoral Commission also assisted municipal authorities in providing rehabilitative care and support to children and adolescents who had ceased their involvement with illegal armed groups. The Office of the President of the Republic was in the process of cross-checking the information available through the Missing Persons and Corpses Information Network System, which was the main platform of the National Missing Persons Register, to identify cases involving the forced recruitment of children and adolescents into illegal armed groups and to separate them out from cases of enforced disappearance. The public officials responsible for maintaining the Register had been trained to distinguish between the two types of case and instructed to record them under separate categories.

45. The Programme for Providing Comprehensive Psychosocial and Health Care to Victims had been created pursuant to Act No. 1448 of 2011 (the Victims and Land Restitution Act) as a means of rehabilitating victims and it included an individual, community and family component. As at 31 December 2015, some 172,000 persons had benefited from the Programme. Civil society organizations and victims' families had been given the opportunity to provide input into the Programme's design through a broad-based consultation process. The Unit for Support and Full Reparation for Victims of Violence oversaw the implementation of two complementary strategies: one to promote the emotional recovery of victims, which, at 31 December 2015, had benefited some 91,200 persons, and another to restore social cohesion by rehabilitating those communities who had been affected by violence.

46. According to an assessment conducted by Harvard University in 2014, the reparation programmes launched under the Victims and Land Restitution Act provided comprehensive coverage, with Colombia being one of the few countries in the world to have devised a strategy to promote the emotional recovery of victims.

47. The inter-agency protocol on the dignified return of bodies of disappeared persons had been introduced by the Disappeared Persons Investigative Commission pursuant to Act No. 1408 of 2010 and was adhered to by a number of State entities. The aim of the protocol was to ensure that the bodies of disappeared persons were returned in a dignified and culturally sensitive manner to their families. Under the protocol, State entities were obliged to consult the families of the disappeared persons before initiating the process of handing over their remains.

48. Ms. Santa (Colombia) said that the pretrial detention centres operated by the Attorney General's Office were not intended to hold persons during prosecution proceedings or persons serving a sentence but were rather intended to facilitate access to justice for persons detained by the police. Although detained persons were only to be held in such centres for a maximum of 24 hours before being brought before the judicial authorities, in reality, many detained persons remained there for longer. Pursuant to an order issued by the Constitutional Court, the Attorney General's Office in March 2016 had ordered the transfer of all persons who had been held in pretrial detention centres beyond the prescribed period of 24 hours to penitentiary centres. Furthermore, the Attorney General's Office had conducted investigations into irregularities identified in such centres. The Committee would be provided with information on the number of investigations conducted and their findings in due course.

49. The procedure for declaring a person missing as a result of enforced disappearance had been introduced pursuant to Act No. 531 of 23 May 2012 to replace the previous procedure, which had proved to be inadequate. The Disappeared Persons Investigative Commission, working in partnership with victims' organizations, had conducted campaigns to raise the awareness of victims and their families of the procedure. Judges had also been trained on its content and application.

50. Mr. Valdés (Colombia) said that the Institute of Forensic Medicine had identified a lack of technical capacity within the Attorney General's Office and the High Council of the Judiciary in the area of forensic examinations and, in an attempt to remedy that deficiency, had trained some 580 prosecutors, 720 police officers and 180 judges on the protocols for conducting autopsies on disappeared persons and on procedures for identifying inhumane, degrading and cruel treatment. In addition, the Institute had laid down a set of criteria for the appropriate interpretation and use of forensic results.

51. Mr. Hazan said that Colombia was to be commended on the openness with which it had approached the interactive dialogue with the Committee and on the technical expertise brought to bear by the different members of the delegation. The Committee noted with satisfaction that the measures taken by the State party to give effect to the provisions of the Convention had led to a decrease in the number of cases of enforced disappearance in the national territory and to greater recognition of victims' rights. However, the Committee remained concerned that new cases of enforced disappearance in which the State had some involvement continued to occur and that offences of enforced disappearance committed by armed groups in the context of conflict were becoming increasingly widespread. The State party should continue its efforts to prevent enforced disappearance, bring perpetrators to justice and provide redress to victims and their families. The Committee's concluding observations and recommendations would provide useful guidance in that regard and should be given due attention and disseminated accordingly.

52. Ms. Londoño Soto (Colombia) said that the Government of Colombia was grateful to the Committee for having accommodated its request to reschedule the interactive dialogue in view of the recent referendum on the peace agreement between the State and the FARC-EP. Despite the rejection of the peace agreement, the Government remained committed to freeing the country from armed conflict. The delegation had taken a self-critical approach in outlining the country's efforts to give effect to the provisions of the Convention and, although there had been a divergence of opinion on certain issues, it had taken due note of the concerns raised by Committee members. The State party recognized the need to step up its efforts to improve the availability of information on cases of enforced disappearance; to provide victims with adequate reparation; to guarantee the non-repetition of the crime of enforced disappearance; to build public confidence in State entities; and to completely eradicate the scourge of enforced disappearance from the national territory. The delegation would provide written responses to all outstanding questions and the requested statistical data within 48 hours.

The meeting rose at 5.40 p.m.
